

Weekly Journal #5
Arpita Pandey

1. What progress did you make on your team's project this week? List concrete steps or actions you took, as well as remaining deliverables you intend to accomplish before the next team meeting. (100-150 words)

I worked on making my changes to the gradebook visible during the demo, currently working on the UI of the gradebook page. Also changing the ui of other pages to be more intuitive such as going from grades to subjects to keep all the ui the same. Working on connecting the pages correctly including the backend of the gradebook to the frontend. Remaining deliverables include a fully functioning gradebook, and connections between all the pages. We also want to finish working on the students page which doesn't have too much left other than also the gradebook, and we need to work on our quarterly poster so we can be ready by week 7.

2. As we approach mid-quarter, what do you see as challenges to completing the team's goals? How would you like the team to address these challenges? (100-150 words)

Some challenges are not enough documentation on a lot of the pages we are working on. I've had to sit down with the team and figure out how certain aspects of the websites work, had trouble finding passwords for sites like the github and the email, and gaining permission and a contributor. This took away a lot of the initial time, as it took a while to troubleshoot. Also, since there are only 3 of us on the team the work takes longer as well. To address these challenges we found it was best to hold dev meetings before each weekly meeting where we found solutions together and looked through all the past work.

3. What have you learned about teamwork so far this quarter? (100-150 words)

I learned it better to work on things together on call or in person as we can troubleshoot right then and there as opposed to over text or waiting till the next meeting. Dev calls were really helpful as we troubleshooted a lot of the problems we were having. Teamwork is all about communication and I believe the team has become really good at that through our google chat as well as discord. We also saw that dividing up the tasks into more manageable parts for each person was very helpful as well. I hope to continue working on our teamwork throughout the rest of the quarter.
